

Sarah Wheeler qualified from Newcastle University in 2004. She worked in community clinics and schools in Nottingham before joining the mainstream schools team in Islington, London in 2006. Sarah joined the Michael Palin Centre in 2009. Her current role at the Centre involves clinical work with children and young people, teaching a range of courses as part of the national training programme and carrying out research. She has recently completed a research study exploring the impact of stammering on parents. Sarah commenced a 3 year part-time Masters course in 2012, in using Cognitive Behavioural Therapy with children and young people, at the Anna Freud Centre in London.